Preface

Research helps us to create new knowledge and develop proper tools for the use of existing knowledge. Not only does it enable health care providers to diagnose and treat the diseases, research also provides evidence for policies and decisions on health development.

The matter delineated for this Research Methodology deals with basic concepts and principles of scientific research methods with particular attention to research in the health field.

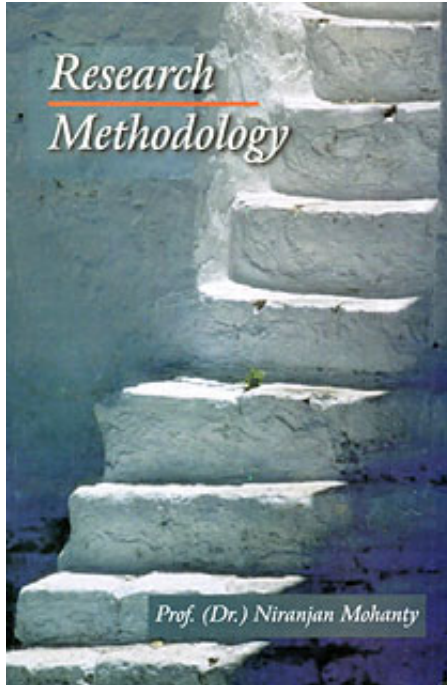

This literature describes methods for planning and conducting scientific research from formulation of problems to setting research objectives, to designing the study, including methods of data collection, statistical analysis as well as interpretation and presentation of data and dissemination of the results.

Care has been taken to accommodate requests front readers to incorporate recent developments on research methodology and experiences of the past.

I am sure this literature will not only provide basic information on research methods in the field but also stimulate the readers to inquire further in to the complex area of Research Methodology as well as increase the productivity of the young researchers.
